

Donald Aversa was born and raised in New York, where he started dancing at 11 years old. He quickly excelled in dance because of his love for it. Shortly after joining dance he started competing, and not to long after that he was winning numerous 1st place overall, and title at several competitions, and even on a national level. While training at Elite Dancers, under the instruction of Camille Leax, Donald ventured out into New York City where he studied and trained under some of the best teachers in New York, such as Frank Hatchett, Joe Lanteri, Gus Giordano, Nan Giordano, Mia Michaels, Brian Freidman, and Chris Jacobson to name a few. He also studied with a ballet company base on Long Island where he trained with some of the biggest names in the international ballet world. He then was given the opportunity to study and perform with the Giordano Jazz Dance Company, in Chicago for several months. Donald has continued to perform in several shows, at Universal Orlando and in charity events, including one for the Tsunami benefit. Donald currently works at a few dance schools where he teaches and choreographs, and has created numerous award winning numbers and choreography. Most recently his chorography has won an FDC (Federation of Dance Competition) Judges Choice Award, which can be voted of by viewers all across America, and some of his dances have been inducted into the Hall of Fame Dance Competition web site. Donald is still dancing and hopes to continue to pursue this as a career.
